

MAR 24 1913

J. R. Commins

VOLUME II.]

ORGAN OF THE NEW ENGLAND LABOR REFORM LEAGUE.

LOWELL, (MASS.) FRIDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 13, 1847.

[NUMBER 51]

THE VOICE OF INDUSTRY,

PUBLISHED EVERY FRIDAY BY

W. F. YOUNG, & MRS. M. EASTMAN.

W. F. YOUNG, EDITOR.

TERMS.—

Single copy, $1.25 per annum. $1. Strictly in ADVANCE.

Five copies to one address, $5. Strictly in ADVANCE.

All communications for the business or editorial department of this paper, will be addressed (Post Paid) to "The Voice of Industry."

Subscribers wishing to continue or persons becoming subscribers, will please bear in mind that our terms are in Advance, and no remittance or subscriptions should be sent us before the date of publication or payment.

Postmasters are authorized to frank letters containing notices of remittances, non-exceptions, discontinuation, and all other Post Office business.

Advertisers are to pay all their bills and proper character, in several reasonable terms.

All subscription monies will be weekly acknowledged.

W. CLOUGH AND A. W. DANIELS, PRINTERS.

POETRY.

THERE MUST BE SOMETHING WRONG.

When earth proddes, free and fair;

The golden waving corn;

When fragrant fields perfume the air;

And silvery flocks are shore;

While thousands move with aching heads;

And sing this crooked song—

"We strive, we die, O give us back!"

There must be something wrong.

When wealth is wrought as savors roll

From off the fruitful soil;

When broken shells from pole to pole;

Reap fruit from human toll;

When from a thousand mouths, encloses

In plenty rolling along;

The others only grize the bough;

There must be something wrong.

And when production never ends,

The earth is yielding ever;

A copious harvest oft begins;

But distribution—never!

When toiling millions work to till

The wealthy offers' cover;

When hands are crushed that work and till,

There must be something wrong.

When poor men's tables waste away

For idleness and sloth;

There must be something in the way,

That's over the finding out;

With such great table boughs,

While others' mites along;

While scarce a chafed hand extends,

There must be something wrong.

Then let no law give equal right

To wealth and to poor;

Let freedom crush the arm of might,

We ask for nothing more;

Until this system is begun;

The bane of our song;

Must, but can be, only one—

There must be something wrong.

THE PROMISE OF THE PRESENT.

The following extract from a poem of the above title.

W. A. GALLAGHER, who died in the Cincinnati Quarterly Journal.

How we're glad!—trifled, slept?

Are we not to do our share,

For right or for conscience, when the fires

Of freedom, what they dared, and did, our noble sires!

THE PROMISE OF THE PRESENT! How! how!

I see the morgue of a perilous pow'r;

Whose mightiest energy, when it's come,

Will stink the sala and stulte nations dumb;

Not here—not here alone,

Perch the torn bosom for a bitter day;

But where's the light of truth hath shewn,

—the Old World away,

Phœnix, well and long

The morn for the sun have told? in sweat,

Nor sleeping rightly of the accured wrong,

But fearing that not yet.

Had come the day of reckoning and wrath,

But now, beside the lone and desolate path

Of slavey'd peanut,—where the rice swamps spread,

Or where his bone and crusty Charist bath,

—Or where Hibernal's scum in bonfire tread;

The dusky Syrian robes with hoion bore,—

Where's a poor and trampled spirit bold,

A desperate purpose nerve for desperate deeds,

And one godless millions, rising from the dust,

Place in look-ing Heav'n their hope, their trust,

And pant to mingle in that glorious fight;

Which shall beat down the Wrong—hit up the Right,

The voice of Senates, and the breath of Kings,

Order and Law shall then be fragile things—

For, as fierce tempests lashing as they sweep,

Tumultuous follows on the sounding Deep,

Strikes down the mightiest fleets, and scatter wide

The prodded armaments, its waves that ride,

Sabotage, passions, of terrific birth,

MISCELLANEOUS.

THINGS HARD TO BE BELIEVED:

BY MRS. LYDIA JANE PEARSON.

"Well, I declare, this is hardly to be believed," exclaimed Mrs. Grandy, as she threw down a letter that she had been perusing, and turned towards her daughter, who was reclining on a crimson-upholished lounge in the most approved style of dress, attitude, and expression. The young lady lifted her jeweled hand and her sleepy-lidded eyes with enquiring interest, as she breathed forth in an affected tone of voice:

"Fay, what have you found, dear mamma? I'm longing for something to chase away this horrible ennui."

"It is hardly to be believed, Anna, your uncle Meek has written to me that he intends to send his daughter Lucy to spend the winter with us. I cannot refuse to receive her, for she is my sister's child—but, dear me! what shall we do with the rustic creature?"

"How came your sister to marry a farmer, minima?"

"Why, Anna, while pa was a Senator, sister and I accompanied him to Washington, one winter, and there we met Mr. Meek, a young and tender member of Congress.—Your aunt was captivated by his fine person, real eloquence, and truly, open character, and although she knew he was only a farmer at home, she persisted in becoming his wife. So he took her home in the state of Ohio, and I have not seen her since; for she soon became a mother, and as she has several children, she was confined at home, and I have been in so delicate health, that I never dared brave such a journey. But she used to write frequently, and although she professed herself perfectly happy, she gave such descriptions of her domestic affairs, that I am sure I should have been utterly miserable in her situation. And this daughter of hers, who milks the cows, bakes butter and cheese, and spins yar, and weaves cloth, and makes bread, and washes clothes and scrubs floors—why she must be a great stout-looking creature like a man, with a sun-burnt face, and coarse hands and feet, and a voice like a market woman. And then she'll be so awkward—oh! dear, what shall we do with her?"

"It is very strange," Lucy said, and then went on: "Well, aint, if you will trust me, I will produce us fine cakes as any cook in the city."

"You are too young, Lucy," said Mrs. Grandy, "even if you had studied cooking all your life; but you seem so confident, and I can do no better, you may try."

"Will you assist me, Anna? I will engage that so far from injuring your fair hands, the slight toil will increase their beauty."

"But what can I do?" asked Anna, laughing.

"O, will direct you," replied Lucy, gaily, and the cousins repaired to the kitchen, where the clatter of culinary operations was enlivened by merry busts of laughter, and joyful gushes of sweet song.

Lucy made her debut at Mrs. Grandy's select party in a robe of pure white muslin, her rich brown curls uncombed, except by a fillet of silver guaze, tied just back of the left ear. She wore no other ornaments; yet amid fine forms, robed in velvet and satin, gashed with gems, and flowers and feathers, she seemed a spirit of a purer sphere, and was decidedly the belle of the gay salons.

"Do you sing, Miss Meek?" enquired the rich and fashionable Mr. Goly, as Miss Grandy arose from the piano.

"Yes," she replied, laughing, "I sing like a wild bird, but I do not play or make music scientifically."

By this time she was the centre of an expectation circle, all eager for the song, and shew without a shadow of embarrassment, sang the Entwick-Shepherd's "Bird of the Wilderness" to a wild sweet air, which the sky-born himself might have paused to hear, it was perfectly enchanting, and the free, full soul of native melody, and the manner in which she gave the line—"Oft to abide in the desert with thee," was imitable.

"What a paragon! this elegant little niece of yours is!" remarked Mr. Le Grand, to Mrs. Grandy, a few days after the party.

"So graceful, and then she has such a perfect taste. Why, her dress person, and character, harmonizes so entirely, that one almost supposes that they came from the same, same school."

Their surprise was no less overwhelming than agreeable, when she bethated, seated pera foot peeping from beneath her travelling dress, as if defying competition, which it might have done with safety. She no sooner perceived her relatives than she sprang to meet them, in the most affectionate manner, and returned gracefully the embraces and kisses which they bestowed upon her with real pleasure.

When Anna, after showing Lucy to her chamber, joined her mother in the saloon she exclaimed:—

"Oh! mamma! I could hardly believe that young lady educated in the country could have been so perfectly genteled as Cousin Lucy is. I love her dearly already."

"And then her wardrobe; why, ma, her dresses are really elegant. So simple and tasteful in style, just like her sweet self; she has never been injured in labor, I am certain."

"Certainly not," replied Mrs. Grandy; "I am happy to find my sister's daughter a real lady. I am glad now that she arrived before the party. She is just an elegant contrast to you, Anna. You will be rose of the repartee, and she will represent the pure white lily."

When the family met at dinner, Mrs. Grandy was almost in despair. The cook she had hired expressly to prepare refreshments for the party, was taken suddenly and violently ill; and neither maid nor mistress knew how to compound or fashion the quantities of beaten eggs, grated sugars, effervescent cream and butter-milk, pulverized spices and clarified butter, that formed with curd and yeast, wine citrons, and oranges and raisins, and currants, and confectionery, a medley of confusion in pantry and kitchen.

"Do you understand baking?" asked Lucy of Anna.

"Oh! indeed, no!" replied the astonished belle.

"Non-sense!" she exclaims of Mrs. Grandy.

"My dear, I never learned," answered the lady.

"It is very strange," Lucy said, and then went on: "Well, aint, if you will trust me, I will produce us fine cakes as any cook in the city."

"You are too young, Lucy," said Mrs. Grandy, "even if you had studied cooking all your life; but you seem so confident, and I can do no better, you may try."

"Will you assist me, Anna? I will engage that so far from injuring your fair hands, the slight toil will increase their beauty."

"But what can I do?" asked Anna, laughing.

"O, will direct you," replied Lucy, gaily, and the cousins repaired to the kitchen, where the clatter of culinary operations was enlivened by merry busts of laughter, and overbearing, moving about the house in her neat check apron, and singing gaily as she performs the business of both cook and maid.

An then she was so hard-hearted. I have known her refuse a gift to an object of charity when her purse was full of gold. Now she will save from her necessities to minister to the sick and needy. And both she and her parents declare that they are happier than they were in the days of wealth and indulgence. Edelcare, when I look back, and then turn to the present, I can hardly believe what I see."

Lucy Meek was married seventeen years ago. We will now look at the present condition of the parties named above. Lucy's husband, the son of a lumber man—who took his bride to a log cabin and commenced house-keeping without a servant to aid her in house-work—has risen rapidly from one post to another, and is now a palatial residence surrounded by a beautiful Eden of his own creation.

"Indeed, Mr. Le Grand, you pay my planning and planting where he is now able to enjoy health, ease, honor and happiness, surrounded by his lovely family."

Mr. Grandy, who, after his failure, accepted a clerk's office and salary, now performs the duties of the place, behind the accountant's desk in the store of his son-in-law.

Miss Anna was married to this gentleman when he was clerk in a dry goods store in New York, but by industry, economy and strict honesty, in all which he has been aided and sustained by his wife—he is now a flourishing merchant in Pittsburgh, Pa., Mrs. Grandy resides with her daughter, and she insists that the reverse is true, for which made them so much wiser and better, and happier was certainly no misfortune.

Mrs. Legrand, who was Mrs. Grandy's most intimate friend, but who could not recognize her after her father's failure, died in a garret two years ago. Mr. Le Grand lost his property in the great fire in New York, became disheartened, and gave himself up to idleness. One of his sons is an apprendice, and one a laoter; of his two daughters, one is a governess in a rich vulgar family—the other is married to a captain, sailor a fine intelligent fellow, who may yet become an admiral or king.

So little reason has any one in this republican country to be lifted up by the mere accident of wealth or station. The poorest man's child may arrive at the highest honors of the State. He who is President to-day, is a private citizen to-morrow; he who is born with every advantage, may eventually earn his bread as a daily laborer, while the son of a maid servant who cleaned the kitchen of the President's house, may be carried there in triumph as its chosen occupant. How ridiculous then in this land, is the haughty pride of wealth or station. How contemptible appears the title "aristocracy," applied to any clique or party. Or can there be any thing more ridiculous absurd, than describing all the fine qualities of mind or person to any particular class or locality. And yet these things are all practiced, while thinking minds observe the continual mutations of the wheel of fortune, and value every person according to the intrinsic worth of character, and thereby things hard to be believed, pass continually before them.

We will pass over three years and listen to the conversation of the same lady and gentleman, now man and wife.

"Well, dear, I have been informed that Lucy Meek has been married to a young farmer of her own neighborhood, whose father used to follow the lumbering business on the Ohio. They say, however, that he is really an active and intelligent young buckeye; but it is singular that she should make such a choice after having rejected Goly."

"Lucy has not acted without reflection, I assure you. She is, an extraordinary girl; Mrs. Grandy blesses her name daily. She says that since they are reduced, they should be perfectly miserable; but for the spirit Anna caught of her cousin Lucy, and the lesson she learned of her. Does it seem wonderful to see Anna, who was so proud and overbearing, moving about the house in her neat check apron, and singing gaily as she performs the business of both cook and maid?

An then she was so hard-hearted. I have known her refuse a gift to an object of charity when her purse was full of gold. Now she will save from her necessities to minister to the sick and needy. And both she and her parents declare that they are happier than they were in the days of wealth and indulgence. Edelcare, when I look back, and then turn to the present, I can hardly believe what I see."

Lucy Meek was married seventeen years ago. We will now look at the present condition of the parties named above. Lucy's husband, the son of a lumber man—who took his bride to a log cabin and commenced house-keeping without a servant to aid her in house-work—has risen rapidly from one post

THE VOICE OF INDUSTRY.

NEW ENGLAND LABOR REFORM LEAGUE.

This Association met in convention at Chapman Hall, Boston, Jan. 17th, and was called to order by the President, David Bryant.

The minutes of the last convention were listened to from the Seely, Miss H. J. Stone, of Lowell; after which the general objects of the League were briefly and comprehensively laid before the meeting by Mr. Campbell, of Boston. Remarks were made by Messrs. Harvey, Young and others.

On motion, W. F. Young, J. Campbell, Miss M. Eastman, J. Putnam and N. W. Brown, were chosen a committee to report Resolutions and business for the convention. Voted, that Messrs. J. Campbell, N. W. Brown and J. Sturritt, constitute a committee of Finance during the sitting of the convention. The following Resolution was presented by E. W. Parkman of Boston, and sustained by some forcible remarks.

Resolved, That Protective Unions should be established in every City, Town and Village throughout this country and the world; the concentration of the wealth of the producers in purchasing the articles they consume carries with it a power which above all others will prove a death to tyrants.

Voted, to accept for discussion.

Voted, that the opening of the evening session be allotted for bearing reports from any Female Associations represented.

Adjourned to 2 o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The committee on Resolutions reported the following for the consideration of the convention.

Resolved, That the objects of the present

Reform movement among the Working Class